

INCREASING MEDIA COVERAGE OF FIGHTING CHANCE

- | | | | |
|-----------------|---|-----------------|--|
| Aug '06 | Coping with Cancer, a Profile of Fighting Chance (Health & Wellness Supplement of Southampton Press) p.2 | Sept '05 | Americas Cup Yachts in Fundraiser (Dans Papers) p.8 |
| July '06 | Article on Summer Gala — (Sag Harbor Express) p.4 | June '05 | Profile of Fighting Chance (Easthampton Star) p.10 |
| July '06 | Picture from Summer Gala (Hampton Cottages & Gardens Magazine) p.5 | Aug '04 | “Increasing the Odds for Cancer Patients” (Sag Harbor Express) p.11 |
| Oct '04 | Hostess for First Fundraiser (Easthampton Star) p.6 | June '05 | “Organization is a Life Saver” (Sag Harbor Express) p.12 |
| Nov '05 | “Day of Hope I” - Survivors’ Panel (Easthampton Star) p.7 | | |

Duncan Darrow
Chairman of the Board
Fighting Chance

From the Chairman . . .

This is our fourth and final newsletter for the year. It takes a look at “Fighting Chance in the press.”

The articles we have reprinted start in 2006, but there are several from 2005 and they go back as far as mid-2004.

The media, I’d say, has become increasingly interested in what we are doing and we have received very positive coverage. The press has also come to understand the wide range of services we offer and what emerges is the picture of a “Cancer Resource Center” -- a logical step in the continued growth of Fighting Chance

Fighting Chance is helping East Enders fight cancer of all types right at home. Launched five years ago, Fighting Chance runs the gamut of helping families cope with cancer, assisting patients of all ages who need help with the fight and, as its website says, “keeping the body and soul together.”

Karrie Zampini Robinson, the director of clinical services at Fighting Chance, recalls how patients used to trek to New York City for what was perceived as superior cancer care to what they could get on the East End.

“People used to not be able to get the support they got in the city,” Ms. Zampini Robinson said. “Organizations out here are trying to change that.”

Thanks to such organizations, and due to such infrastructural changes as expanded medical facilities and services on the South Fork, an increase in the number of health practitioners in the region, affiliations with hospitals and practices to the west, and growing public awareness of the importance of support groups and services, it is now easier – or at least less difficult – to cope with cancer on the East End than it was back when Ms. Roden was diagnosed.

In fact, “Day of Hope: Coping With Cancer on the East End” was the name of a November 2005 conference in Sag Harbor organized by Fighting Chance, co-sponsored by Southampton Hospital and funded by various local benefactors.

The Sag Harbor - based Fighting Chance cancer support group publishes a local resource guide (left). The organization’s symbol is a lifesaver (above).

» CANCER, FROM PAGE 12

A true community effort also supported by the South Fork Breast Health Coalition, CancerCare of the Hamptons and Ellen's Well, "the conference was developed to present medical advances and the current trends in cancer treatment," according to Southampton Hospital spokeswoman Nora Perry. With the goal of "outlining practical approaches to health and harmony," the conference featured renowned doctors and other experts from New York City, Boston and Long Island. There were clinical and surgical overviews, survivor stories, sessions on subjects such as stress management and cancer in the workplace, a panel discussion with East End oncologists and a health fair with displays by local organizations. Some 200 people attended.

"Coping With Cancer on the East End" is also the name of a comprehensive, practical resource guide available for free from Fighting Chance. The 17-chapter booklet includes information on hospitals, pharmacies, second opinions, home health services, tips for coping with cancer, and much more. Call 725-4646 or visit www.fightingchance.org to request a copy.

Karrie Zampini Robinson, director of clinical services at Fighting Chance, at work in her Sag Harbor office. Photo by Dana Shaw

The Sag Harbor Express

May 26, 2006

THE CITIZEN: A Brief Vacation

By Anthony Brandt

I had too wonderful a weekend as the weather smiled upon my favorite charity, the Sag Harbor-based cancer care organization, Fighting Chance, which I've been involved with from the beginning. We had scheduled a fund-raising dinner for Friday night at a beautiful house in East Hampton, 100 people were coming to dine in the garden of this house, and rain would have been a nightmare.

Not only didn't it rain, we had maybe the best, driest, most comfortable evening we've had all summer. We didn't need to spend money on a tent. The directors did most of the cooking themselves. I cooked sausages, donated by Mike Schiavoni of the IGA downtown. Somebody gave us lobster at cost; we had chicken, too; the chairman and founder, Duncan Darrow, and his wife, Wendy Moonan, made potato salad for 100 people; somebody else donated enough wine to keep us all happy. The dinner was a huge success. We had a silent auction. We raised a lot of money.

Many of the people who bought tickets had local connections, were born and raised or had lived here a long time. All the directors have been touched by cancer in one way or another. We now have a top-notch staff, we have support groups running, our website gets well over 1,000 hits a month and our web manager is a trained social worker who counsels people on the Internet who have questions about cancer care; while the oncological social worker who runs the support groups has many years of experience at Sloan-Kettering and knows as well as anyone I've ever met how to deal with people in crisis. We're beginning to get interest on a national level from the people who pay attention to cancer care organizations. Joy to the heart, tears to the eyes. We're good, folks. This is what a communal effort can do. it's a thing of beauty.

Cancer Cares

FIGHTING CHANCE, a nonprofit organization providing counseling to East End cancer patients, held Cancer Cares, a dinner and auction fundraiser on July 7.

The Home of Rick & Sue Davies
97 Middle Lane
East Hampton

The Board of Directors of
Fighting Chance

Cordially invite you to join them for our Annual Shore Dinner

(with all the "fixin's" -- clam chowder, grilled lobster, corn-on-the-cob, potato salad and strawberry shortcake)

Saturday, July 7th
6 pm

at the home of
Rick and Sue Davies
97 Middle Lane (at intersection of Cross Highway).

Our evening will include a Silent and Live Auction conducted by Alistair Clarke, Sothyby's Auctioneer

1

2

3

FELLOW FIGHTERS
 < 1 > Homeowners Sue and Rick Davies.
 < 2 > Co-host Dr. Philip Schulman and son Daniel with Dr. Martin Karpch Jr. and wife Julia. < 3 > Jeff Sander with Jill and Dan Dienst of Dienst + Dotter and Wendy Lyon Moonan. < 4 > Corcoran's Emma Clurman, Richard DeRose and Ellen Hanson with husband Richard Periman. < 5 > Meredith Darrow with a silent auction item. < 6 > Linda Melville with Reverend Darwin Price. < 7 > David and Lisa Matlin.

4

5

6

7

THE EAST HAMPTON STAR

SHINES FOR ALL

OCTOBER 14, 2004

Fighting Chance, a network of East End residents who have been touched by cancer, held its first benefit party Sunday in East Hampton. Its 50-page resource guide, "Coping With Cancer on the East End," is available free at www.fightingchance.org. Seen above is Sue Davies, who together with her husband, Rick, gave the party, and Duncan Darrow, the group's founder.

Morgan McGovern

THE EAST HAMPTON STAR

SHINES FOR ALL

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 2005

East End cancer survivors shared their experiences at the Fighting Chance Day of Hope conference. The panel included, from left, Jeremy Samuelson, Jan Moran, Chuck Hitchcock, and Harry Heller. Susie Roden also spoke. Carissa Katz

FIGHTING CHANCE

Hope at a Day About Cancer Treatment

BY JENNIFER LANDES

On one of the last temperate, sunny Saturdays of the year, some 300 people took time to sit in the darkened semicircle of the Bay Street Theatre this week to participate in a program dedicated to cancer.

Although the event might sound depressing on its surface, it was a day devoted to hope. And about 200 of those people who either had survived cancer, were being treated for cancer, or were recently diagnosed, were offered a measure of help and encouragement in their struggles.

Fighting Chance, a nonprofit Sag Harbor organization that provides information and access to resources for East End cancer patients, organized the symposium with Southampton Hospital...

Dr. Norton described how advances in treatment, many of them in recent years, have brought doctors closer to eradicating the disease. Dr. Altorki said that early detection techniques were allowing lung cancer patients a better chance at surgery and ultimate survival. Breast cancer and lung cancer are two of the most common cancers in the country and lung cancer is one of the deadliest.

After the doctors' presentations, a panel of local doctors, Louis Avvento, Renu Hausen, and Marilyn McLaughlin, joined them to answer the audience's questions about treatment advances, drug trials, the role of politics in getting money for research, the role of the environment as a cause of cancer, and how to deal with treatment complications....

Providing an intimate look at the process of treatment and the issues involved were a group of five cancer survivors. Karrie Zampini Robinson, an oncological social worker who is the director of clinical programs at Fighting Chance and served as the conference's moderator, called the experience of cancer "a series of crises" from diagnosis to treatment. "No one can help you more than people who have been there," she observed....

According to Mr. Darrow, out of 62 counties in New York State, Suffolk is ranked seventh in number of people diagnosed with cancer.

To address the growing need, Mr. Darrow said Fighting Chance will try to offer smaller workshops over the course of the year on specific cancers in addition to larger conferences. More information on the topics presented at the conference can be found at the Web site fightingchance.org. A copy of the free book "Coping with Cancer on the East End" can be ordered there.

Dan's Papers

SPECIAL SECTION: HEALTH & FITNESS

For the Cup

Aboard a World Champion 12-Meter Yacht Racing in Noyac Bay

Dan's
DAREDEVILS

By Dan Rattiner

Last week was the annual HarborFest at Sag Harbor, and besides the oompah band on Long Wharf, the walking tours, the chowder contests, the farmers market by the windmill and the face painting, there was a sailboat race in Noyac Bay called the First Annual Sag Harbor Charity Cup Challenge. This was billed as the highlight of the weekend, six beautiful 12-meter racing sloops that at one time or another either competed in or won the America's Cup yacht event, which next year will be defended by the Swiss at Valencia, Spain.

You may have seen the America's Cup on television. It's held every few years. It was last held in 2002 at Auckland, New Zealand, where over a series of weeks, various 70' long sailboats, all specially built for the occasion to exacting rules, came from around the world to compete against one another in head to head competition for the right to challenge the New Zealanders. Entries came from Italy, England, France, Sweden, Spain, the United States, and, improbably, Switzerland, which has no body of water in which to hold these grand yacht races. In the end, the Swiss boat Alinghi prevailed, and then, in four straight races on four straight days, trounced the New Zealand champion New Zealand Magic, sometimes by as much as eight minutes over a course that took approximately three hours to complete.

as a yachtsman was zero, I thought, would just make it more interesting.

Four days and five phone calls later, at 6 o'clock on the Saturday morning of Harborfest, I was in East Hampton staggering across the bedroom trying to locate the alarm clock to turn it off. It was just before dawn. There would be a meeting of the crew of the 12-meter champion "Weatherly" in a private home in downtown Sag Harbor at 8 a.m.

What does one wear to crew a 12-meter yacht? I tried to imagine what I had seen Ted Turner wearing when I saw him on television in the 1970s winning the America's Cup. I tried to imagine what I had seen Dennis Conner wearing when he dominated the sport in the 1980s. Rain slickers? Starched whites with red bandanas? Nothing came to mind. I opted for khaki shorts, long socks and sneakers, a white cotton shirt and straw hat. The straw hat I knew was wrong. But we would be three or four hours on the water, and I wanted to stay out of the sun.

At eight, I arrived at the home of Duncan and Wendy Darrow, a small cottage on a narrow street not far from the Whaling Museum. When I arrived, I found that all but two of the crew were there, sitting around a grand dining room table enjoying bacon and eggs and muffins. Who was there — and they all stood up politely from their break-

Photo by Wendy Darrow

I am certain I am not the only man or woman in the world who would like, once in his or her lifetime, to feel what it would be like to crew on one of these yachts during a competition. And so when I heard that some of these yachts would be in Sag Harbor for HarborFest, I got on the phone to make it happen. That my experience fasts to shake my hand hello — were large, brawny, sunburned, athletic looking men and women, some of whom had on Belize Yacht Club shirts or caps with insignias from some yacht race in Norway or Australia. Breakfast continued on for a while — they were eaters — and soon the stragglers arrived. I sat next to Doug Mercer, whose family had actually ordered the Weatherly built for the 1958 races in Newport. He was a graduate of the Merchant Marine Academy in Kings Point and had manned the mainsail during the Weatherly's victory in 1962. He lives in East Hampton.

(continued on the next page)

For the Cup (continued from previous page)

"I was told there would be no beer allowed on board," someone with a heavy Australian accent said. "But yesterday our Captain got a special dispensation from the race chairman."

A cheer went up at the breakfast table.

An interesting thing happened during the one-mile walk from the Darrow's home to the Sag Harbor Yacht Club where, we were told, the Weatherly was berthed. About halfway there — we were now all wearing identical white shirts with the name of the boat monogrammed on it — we came down a side street to find, coming down the main drag, the grand HarborFest parade marching toward the town center. The lead police car with the flashing light passed. And looking way back down the street behind that car, we could see the various fire departments and Cub Scouts and even a giant Styrofoam whale on wheels that would soon follow.

We stopped for a moment. It would take a long time for the parade to pass. We'd have to wait. Or would we?

"What the hell," somebody said. "We're uniform. Let's crash the parade."

Behind the police car with the flashing light came the lead car, a Model T Ford with parade chief Paul Sydney waving to the crowd. In the space just behind him, we snuck in.

It worked out fine. At the front of our little group, carrying a large orange life ring between us, were myself and Wendy Darrow. The rest of the crew followed, marching smartly along and waving to the spectators. The band played.

"It took us WEEKS to put together this float!" I shouted out to a woman with two children.

We arrived at the Sag Harbor Yacht Club on Bay Street and found the Weatherly, all 64 feet of her, lined up along the pier with the other five America's Cup yachts we would be racing against. They included: the Columbia, which had won the cup in 1958; Intrepid, which won in 1967 and 1970; the American Eagle, which had been captained by Ted Turner; Heritage, which narrowly lost to Intrepid in 1970; and Nefertiti, which had been favored to win in 1962 but had been defeated by the boat we were on. We climbed aboard. Crews climbed aboard all the other ships, and soon we were underway.

Photo by Dan Kuttner

What a parade of boats we made, as we headed out the channel, all six ships, sails up, heading toward the racing grounds accompanied by some of the spectator boats.

I met some of the other people on board our boat. There was Gil Meister, a weekend sailor from East Hampton and New York who was an investor in media companies. There was John McKenna who raced J-105s, there was architect and developer John Shanholt of East Hampton, Frances Schultz from Atlanta, George Muhlfeld who heads the sailing club at Devon Yacht Club, Carrie Swift from Sag Harbor who has worked around boats her whole life, David Berridge who has captained several Maxi Boats, Ben Gilligan who is Now we were coming up on the start/finish line. It was thirty yards ahead and we were in the lead. I looked back. Each of the other five boats was lined up directly behind us. We were going to win.

A cannon shot was fired from the stern of the officials' boat not fifteen feet from us. We all jumped. There was a puff of smoke. All the spectators cheered. We had won.

And so we sailed home back toward Sag Harbor. On the way, I learned that each of the boats had been chartered by a different organization, the money going to charity. One of the boats had on board sailors from a real estate firm. Our boat had many crew members from a cancer care organization called FIGHTING CHANCE, which will sponsor a daylong conference for patients and caregivers in Sag Harbor on November 12 from 9:30 to 4 at the Bay Street Theatre. It is entitled "Coping With Cancer on the East End: A Day of Education and Hope."

A Better Fighting Chance Against Cancer

One family's illness inspires a new resource

BY CARISSA KATZ

When someone is first diagnosed with cancer, navigating the health care system and negotiating the logistics of treatment can be almost as daunting as understanding the disease. Duncan Darrow of Sag Harbor, the founder of the non-profit organization Fighting Chance, learned that firsthand when his mother was diagnosed in 2001 with lung cancer that had spread to her bones.

During an early visit with her to Southampton Hospital, he and his brother, Peter, asked if there were a booklet listing resources for cancer patients and their families, some kind of map for the rough road ahead.

"They gave me a one-page sheet with the numbers for the Dominican Sisters and a taxi service," he recalled late last month.

His frustration became the impetus behind a 50-page resource guide, "Coping With Cancer on the East End," published by Fighting Chance in 2004. Last month, the organization issued an updated guide with 75 pages of phone numbers, basic information, and practical tips for people with cancer.

The learning curve with cancer is steep, but traveled quickly. "This provides the reader with a little bit of strategic planning," Mr. Darrow said.

In the months after his mother's diagnosis, Mr. Darrow's family, like so many dealing with terminal cancer, put together its own small network of helpers. "We just scrambled to be good caregivers," he said.

"No sooner do you feel you've stabilized then the disease progresses and you have to readjust the platform." He and his brother are lawyers. "We are fairly well educated and fairly well organized." Still, they sometimes struggled to track down the new information they needed from one week to the next.

"I had time to take phone calls. I was in an office; I was a senior partner in a law firm. I could leave at a moment's notice if I had to," Mr. Darrow said. "I kept thinking about the next guy that came behind me."

He wanted to save other people some of the trouble he had been through and to share the resources he had gathered while caring for his mother. She died in June 2001, and within a few months he had formed and incorporated Fighting Chance.

"I went on a kind of listening tour." After his mother's death, he Spurred on by his mother's cancer, Duncan Darrow founded Fighting Chance in 2001 to provide practical information to East End residents with cancer.

Carissa Katz

A Better Fighting Chance Against Cancer

Continued from A1
was hospitalized twice. "Now, I'm in the bed feeling very disempowered," he recalled, but it helped him better understand the medical system from the patient's point of view.

In 2003, after being trained to care for the sick through East End Hospice, Mr. Darrow assembled a board of directors for Fighting Chance. All 16 board members have had or have been closely touched by cancer of one type or another, and, like Mr. Darrow, they were mobilized by their experiences.

Given that Suffolk has one of the highest cancer diagnosis rates of the state's 62 counties, one should not be surprised that so many people on the East End have been affected by the disease, but the brief biographies of the board of directors are sobering. Coming from the worlds of business, the arts, education, and the clergy, they serve as a reminder that cancer obeys no social niceties.

The 2005 Fighting Chance resource guide, published in partnership with CancerCare, a national nonprofit group, follows the arc of cancer from diagnosis to treatment to recovery or hospice care, and attempts to provide some guidance for each step along the way. It offers contact information for doctors and oncologists on the East End, discusses second opinions, and talks about the different hospitals and health care centers where someone can be treated.

It also addresses complementary therapies such as acupuncture, massage, and counseling, and answers basic questions like "Where do I go to get the equipment I need to care for myself or my loved one?" or "How can I find the transportation I need to get to and from all of my doctor's appointments?"

There is a chapter on spiritual support and another on community organizations like the South Fork Health Initiative, East Hampton Meals on Wheels, the Family Counseling Center in Riverhead, as well as cancer support groups.

Fighting Chance compiled all the resources its board members and employees could find so that cancer patients would not have to wear themselves out tracking it down. But for those who have the time or inclination to do more research, the booklet also lists dozens of cancer-related Web sites.

Through its alliance with CancerCare, Fighting Chance has "deepened our resources with something that we couldn't afford," Mr. Darrow said. People who need counseling, or who have questions that might be beyond the scope of Fighting Chance's expertise, are referred to the CancerCare hotline in New York, which is staffed by 30 oncological social workers.

Fighting Chance has also worked in the past two years to build a bridge to Southampton Hospital and is trying to establish a medical advisory committee of local physicians. It hired a deputy director, Janine M. Vito, last year, and now has a part-time oncological social worker, Kerri Zampini Robinson, formerly of Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York City, on staff at its office in Sag Harbor.

Fighting Chance has started to set up peer-to-peer counseling, in which cancer patients can talk to people who have survived the same type of cancer. Though it started without so much as a mailing list, the organization has grown slowly but surely, and has even secured a few foundation and corporate business grants. "I've been very surprised by people's generosity," Mr. Darrow said. "I've been very grateful because I know what cancer did to our family."

Since his mother was diagnosed, Mr. Darrow said he has noticed a marked difference in how society deals with the disease. "I find that the willingness of people to talk about it and to use the word 'cancer' and be more candid has changed in some measurable way in the last three years." Through Fighting Chance, he is doing his part to see that people keep talking.

"One of the goals this year is to connect with more doctors and get this guide in more doctors' offices. We have to earn their respect." Fighting Chance will host its first conference, on cancer care in a rural setting, this fall.

"Coping With Cancer on the East End" is distributed free in hospitals, libraries, and doctors' offices, or by mail. It can also be found on the Fighting Chance Web site, www.fightingchance.org.

BUSINESS TODAY

Increasing the Odds for Cancer Patients

BY PEGGY SPELLMAN HOEY

Fleeting moments sometimes offer up different choices to human beings in the form of chances, while our free will determines the course we stay. Chances are just that, once lost they are gone forever.

Cancer patients and their loved ones ponder these thoughts when faced by the varying forms of the killer disease as the line between chance and choice blurs. Some feel they missed their chance to make another choice or change a life decision, while others feel overwhelmed by the many choices they must make regarding their course of treatment. Not only do the patients and their families face an uphill battle physically, but a mental and emotional one as well.

"It still amazes me what it does to families," said Duncan Darrow, chairman of Fighting Chance. "When someone is diagnosed with cancer it involves not only them, as the patient, but their family members. Not only is the patient diagnosed with cancer, but their families. The family is a sleeping giant."

When Darrow, a Manhattan lawyer, learned of his mother's lung cancer diagnosis in 2001 knew he would face the dilemma along with her. All of a sudden Darrow was running with the ball, so to speak. It was an eye-opener for Darrow who learned all too quickly that there are a limited number of radiation facilities on Long Island. Then he was faced with the question of how he would transport his mother to the facility. All of this comes into play, he said.

Darrow's mother succumbed 90 days later. For the first six months, Darrow mourned his mother's loss, however, by year's end he had formed Fighting Chance in response.

"I was talking with friends over dinner when I came up with the name," Darrow reminisced. "I was speaking of my mother and I remember telling them all she really wanted was a fighting chance. They told me that would be a great name for the organization. So, there you have it, what it is today 'Fighting Chance'. There I was — me and my name — with my mother in the graveyard."

In the last ten years, the number of cancer diagnoses has increased relative to the population explosion on the East End. These patients have a particularly hard time coping during their ordeal because of limited resources within an already limited field. The Fighting Chance organization of volunteers has compiled a comprehensive guide to everything from cancer doctors, alternative treatments to clinical trials and transportation. The guide, titled, "Coping with Cancer on the East End: A Practical Resource Guide," is the only one of its kind geared towards helping patients and their loved ones. In turn, they hope to increase the odds of beating the killer disease.

"The guide's very logical," said Darrow. "It's basically like 'Zagat's'. We have had a little bit of positive feedback already. We want people to come and talk to us if they have questions or if they need counseling. We hope to empower people."

"Cancer treatment in a rural setting is a very distinct thing," said Darrow. "Most great cancer centers are in the city like Memorial Sloan Kettering Hospital, so if you are in a rural setting you must sometimes either ask for a second opinion or transfer to an urban setting for more treatment at some point in the future. But, how do you get to that point?"

Fighting Chance is located in a small office in Sag Harbor Village. For more information or copies of their guide a volunteer can be contacted at (631) 725-4646, P.O. Box 1358 or info@fightingchance.org For more information interested parties may log onto the internet at www.fightingchance.org

KARRI ZAMPINI ROBINSON, DUNCAN DARROW AND JANINE VETO

shaw photo

FIGHTING CHANCE

Organization Is a Life Saver

One year after opening, help thousands cope with cancer

BY RACHAEL SHAW

It is exactly one year since "Fighting Chance" opened up its office in a little alley off Main Street, Sag Harbor. Since then the charity, which is committed to providing support and information for cancer patients and caregivers, has grown remarkably.

The charity's story actually begins two years ago, in 2003, when Fighting Chance first came into existence. The first twelve months were spent preparing what Duncan Darrow, Fighting Chance's Chairman, describes as "a yellow pages for cancer care." This guide, "Coping with Cancer on the East End" is the focal point of Fighting Chance's efforts to provide support for cancer sufferers in the local community. Compiled with the help of members of the medical profession, it provides patients and caregivers with the necessary tools to find answers to all kinds of questions concerning cancer and the practical difficulties that are involved in its treatment.

"Fighting Chance realizes how important it is to have bridges with the medical community," says Darrow, and to this end, a Medical Advisory Committee has been set up with doctors and administrators from hospitals such as Southampton, Riverhead and Memorial Sloan Kettering. Janine Veto, Deputy Director of Fighting Chance says, "it's our job to build up doctor confidence in Fighting Chance, so they see our guide really can be a helpful part of patient counseling." Kerri Zampini Robinson has also come on board. Formerly Director of Post-Treatment at Memorial Sloan Kettering, Robinson offers a unique insight as an oncological social worker and will be a liaison with the Medical Advisory Committee. She praises the guide saying that, "it gives them [cancer patients and caregivers] what they need. It is relevant and informative."

Over the past year, Fighting Chance has seen its website "explode," now receiving over 4,000 hits every month.

Further evidence of the charity's success is provided by their recent partnership with Cancer Care, a national non-profit that provides free, professional services to people with cancer. The two organizations have co-published the new edition of the guide but Darrow says that there is more to the collaboration - "Cancer Care is a national organization. If we have a caller with a significant level of stress we can now refer them to Cancer Care to ensure that they receive the help they need."

"We're working with cancer patients at the grass roots level in Suffolk County," he said. "We know a lot about local resources because we sort of 'wrote the book' on that. So, out here, we can really help cancer patients map out the support system they need to improve their chances of survival."